

Presented by Paul Wells, Senior Columnist for Maclean's Magazine

As Senior Columnist for Maclean's magazine, Paul Wells is one of Canada's foremost political commentators.

Fresh, funny and authoritative, he was hailed by Mordecai Richler as "a columnist for whom I have the highest regard" and by Robert Fulford as "a first-class Ottawa reporter." He has written for Time magazine, the National Post, La Presse and the Literary Review of Canada. His blog, Inkless Wells, is required reading in Ottawa and wherever people spend too much time worrying about politics.

A veteran television and radio commentator whose insights have educated and entertained audiences in French and English, Wells recently spent a year in Paris as Maclean's Europe correspondent, where he reported from Germany, Poland, the UK, Afghanistan and Pakistan. He is on the Advisory Committee of the new Glendon School of Public Affairs and is a Fellow of the new School of Public Policy Governance at the University of Toronto.

The Rise and Fall of Stephen Harper's Stealth Federalism

One of the least-noticed features of Stephen Harper's time in office has been the disappearance of executive federalism. Remember when the federal and provincial governments used to meet and talk? Those days are gone. But not forever: the looming end of the 2005 health care accord, and other pressing issues, mean our governments will have to start talking again.
