Canada is undergoing important transformations that are reshaping the context in which public policy is designed and implemented. The capacity of governments to respond effectively to change depends not only on stability, but also on their ability to adapt over time.

This event will examine the state of governance in Canada at a time of growing complexity and uncertainties. The discussion will invite reflection on the strengths and limits of current governance models and what may be needed to build more effective and trusted institutions. This discussion will be moderated by Michelle Bussière-Prytula, Graduate Chair and Associate Professor, JSGS.
